

Browning already strongly illuminated work. I have used the word in its literal sense to express my intention of merely looking over the ground covered by his life and poetry, and the place the two seem to have occupied in the generation to which he belonged. I have laid more stress upon criticisms by other than upon my personal views, holding, with the Rev. IV. Ingham, that where so much has been said, and that so well said, I could add little of value; but in sifting the mass of critical material that has gathered about Browning's poetry, I have, of course, been influenced by my own impression of him as well as by the authority of the critic. When the adequate biography appears, it should be a very interesting book, answering a demand to which mine is not directed; but if I strengthen in any degree the feeling that Browning's poetry is to be read like that of other poets, not as a task but for the reader's pleasure, I shall be content.
