They are friends, and the young man is ill. In fact, my head swam round, and I swooned again, and have no remembrance but of a confused babble of sounds. When I came to, Madeleine and the needle-seller, whose name was La Croisette, were conveying me between them; or, in fact, he was chiefly carrying me, and she supporting my feet. I said, Set me down, Ill try to walk, but found I could not. Then she said, Wait here; Ill run on a little, and find where Gabrielle is. I would have stayed her, but she was gone. La Croisette said, You seem in trouble; what is it? I said, Dont you know the dragoons are in Nismes? They have tried to burn my mother, have bound and beaten my father, destroyed our property, and cudgelled and burnt me till I cannot stand. He drew in his breath, and said, Any one of those things is trouble enough. Is that pretty girl your sister? No; my affianced wife. And you have taken to Les Arenes for safety, and left your father and mother behind? Not willingly, you may be sure. My mother and Madeleine half carried me hither. Then we saw my fathers silk factory in flames, and she ran to find him. Madeleine here returned, and said, encouragingly, I have found where they are; it is a very little way, and they look so comfortable! With her help and La Croisettes I dragged myself along, and though it seemed a long way off, we got there at last; and very snug did the old vault look, with the little brazier and the lamp, and the curtain to keep off the draught, and food and bedding on the floor. I sank down on the straw they had prepared for me, and never was couch of
