Not illustrated. 1882 Excerpt: ...p rushed at the child and sent him also sprawling on the grass. Lena raised the screaming boy and turned to scold her pet, but Billy, proud of his successful performances, butted at her again fiercely, causing the child to scream louder in terror. Lena could only seize his hand and run to the house, calling as she ran for Tom or some one to catch the offender. After this it was of course decided that Billy should be locked up till he could in some way be disposed of. Yet even then he managed to escape at times to the very pleasant study at the back of the house, overlooking the gardens and lawn, which Dr. Selwyns pupils generally occupied. The French, windows opened on to a verandah, and the young men, with whom Billy was still an amusement, would pet and feed him as well as encourage him to stay during their hours of rest from work. In the summer the windows were often left open while the students were absent, and Billy, when he could release himself and obtain his freedom, had paid many visits to this room unknown to any one in the house. A discovery, however, of his performances on these occasions, when his quietness had prevented any suspicions of his whereabouts, was not made until the commencement of the long vacation. The gentlemen, while collecting their MS. books containing themes and essays in Latin, Greek, and English, made the astounding discovery that Billy possessed the most remarkable literary tastes, for they found to their dismay that leaf after leaf of the literary work to which they had devoted so much time had been devoured by the mischievous young animal. What was to be done with him? A proposal to turn him into venison met with tearful yet earnest opposition from Lena; indeed no one seemed willing to agree to such an end for poor Bi...
